

Around the time when students are completing college applications, there are visitors from different higher education institutions across the nation. Some of these organizations include branches of the U.S. military, namely the Airforce, the Marines, the Navy and the Army. Although these organizations are allowed to directly recruit students from campuses, there are restrictions on how they communicate with students. As students contemplate their ventures into the real world, some feel that the military's purpose to inform is respectable, while others are less comfortable with their efforts.

"It's good to promote the military and show what it's about, but I wouldn't want them to come up to me personally."

Julio Colis

"With rising tuition, it's good that you can go into the military and still come back to get an education that's paid for."

Oscar Gaytan

"The Navy isn't just a fallback option; it's a great way to get ahead in life."

David Watson
Navy Recruiter

"I'm okay with it because, if the school allows them to be here, then it's fine."

Shannon Tay

How do you feel about the military's presence on campus?

"It doesn't bother me. Not too many people notice [their booths], but if I were a parent, I wouldn't accept them recruiting on campus because I wouldn't want my kids to join the military."

Cindy Hang

"It's good because they're not recruiting, but they give you the option by being on campus."

Jacob Castro
